USING CONVERSATION QUESTIONS IN THE CLASSROOM

Let me begin by saying, these tips on how to use conversation questions in the classroom are based on what I have found to work in my classes. You may have to tweak or disregard some of my advice to accommodate your own teaching style. With that in mind, let's get started.

Timing

First let's talk about how much time to allocate for questions. When planning lessons, I most often follow a rough rule of a minimum of one minute per question and a maximum of three minutes per question. That doesn't really indicate how much time they will spend on each individual question; it's just a rough estimate for judging the amount of time it will take to finish a set of questions.

So if you give your students ten questions, you'll burn between ten to thirty minutes of class time. Now of course this isn't a steadfast rule, there will always be exceptions. All things considered though, about twenty minutes for ten questions is the average for my classes.

Another quick point, if you can limit how many questions they see at a time (using PowerPoint or spaced handouts) they will answer questions more fully and take more time. I find showing them five questions at a time makes for a good pace.

Group Size

Next, you need to decide how many students to put into each group. As a general rule of thumb I find that three students in a group is the ideal number. I say this because with three students everyone gets a good chance to talk but there are still enough people to have a rich reservoir of ideas to discuss.

Two students really maximize talking time, but often the two students don't get along or you might have two shy students that end up together.

Four students can work, but often there isn't enough talk time for each student and shy students feel like they are on stage every time they talk.

Five students in a group is far too many and often they just won't talk. All this being said, ultimately it comes down to the dynamics of your class and its size.

If you have a really talkative class with a good dynamic, putting them in pairs works well. Groups of four generally work best with groups of shy students, because they feel more pressure to speak if everyone in the group is silent.

Mistakes are okay

Assure your students that mistakes are okay. Tell them they should try to produce the target grammar correctly. If they make mistakes unrelated to the target grammar, let them know that it's okay. Tell them that you are happy when they make mistakes because that means they are trying new and difficult ways of saying things.

One thing to stress is that they shouldn't be speaking their native language. It is better to say something that is incorrect or unclear in English than correctly and clearly in their first language.

Let the conversation flow

Another important point to stress is that they are free to discuss more than just the questions. Even though you are trying to focus on practicing grammar, a natural conversation moves from one subject to another; and this is what you want in your classes as well. As long as they are practicing the target grammar most of the time, don't get involved.

Very often students will treat questions like an ordered set of goals to accomplish. Let them know if they don't discuss them all, that's okay!

If they spend the whole time talking about just one question, that's great. It means they are having a natural conversation. Just make sure they are speaking only in English! I tell my students they can discuss whatever questions they think are interesting. If they don't think any questions are interesting, they should make their own questions.

Keep out of the discussion

After you have put the students into groups and they are talking, there is one important point to remember. Stay out of the discussion! I know it may be tempting to make a comment, but this is their time to discuss.

The only time you should be interrupting their discussion is when they ask you for help. Sometimes you can interject if a student is repeatedly using the target grammar incorrectly. You don't want them practicing the grammar point incorrectly. Otherwise, stay out of the discussion.

So what are you doing while they are discussing? You are monitoring each group's discussion and taking notes.

Take notes

While you are monitoring your students' discussions, you should be taking notes. Take note of any errors that are being made repeatedly (i.e. errors in grammar, pronunciation or vocabulary use), especially problems with the target grammar. Write down some specific sentences that contain common errors you hear or that contain errors you wish to work on.

Decide which errors or mistakes would be useful to go over with the class and at the end of class or at the end of the discussion go over some of these mistakes and errors. When you go over the errors, keep them anonymous and let students know that it's a good thing if they see their mistake on the board. You might let the class try to correct the errors or correct them yourself for the class depending on how much time you have.

So those are the tips I have for using conversation questions in an adult ESL class. You may find that these tips don't suit your teaching style. Give them a try and if they don't mesh with your teaching style, try something different. Every teacher teaches differently and every student learns differently. Ultimately the goal is to find what works best for you and your class.

EXTRAS

There are just a couple of extras I want you to be aware of as you look through this book and use it in your classes.

Bounty for errors

If you find an error in this ebook, email me at:

larrypitts@eslconversationquestions.com

As a reward I will send you a free copy of any one of our ebooks. You can choose from one of these books:

ESL Role Plays: 50 Engaging Role Plays for ESL and EFL Classes

1,000 Conversation Questions: Designed for Use in the ESL or EFL Classroom

Join our reviewer program

We are always looking for qualified reviewers for our books. But we don't want to offer free review copies to just anyone. We want to offer them to people who are more likely to leave a review since they have left reviews in the past.

So if you leave a review of this book and are interested in receiving a free digital copy of one of our books as a review copy, let me know which of the reviews is yours and which book you are interested in at:

larrypitts@eslconversationquestions.com

We only ask that you actually review the review copy we send you. Once you write a review of the book we sent you, we can send you a digital review copy of another one of our books.

We' ll also send you a review copy of any new books we come out with.

ENJOY THE BOOK?

Check out our other books

We are always working on more books, so this list is sure to grow. Here are the books we have out at the moment:

ESL Role Plays: 50 Engaging Role Plays for ESL and EFL Classes
